A virtual reality game that recreated battlefield in British Malaya. It reflects upon the heroic story of Leffenan Adnan who fought Japanese Occupation during World War II in 1942. It tracends a player in a historical national events, for remembering the battle at Pasir Panjang.

VR presents a unique opportunity to showcase re-enactment of heroism in commemorating historical events, addressing social learning theory and cognitive behavioral learning.

Established as a digital vr game application to commemorate the battle set within Opium Hill or known as Bukit Chandu on February 14, 1942 at Pasir Panjang, where the Malay Regiment faced the Japanese in an intense combat and desperation as the Malay Regiment fought valiantly on the ridge and held the Japanese for two days until they were out of ammunition. Forcing them to fight the enemy in hand-to-hand combat where they were almost destroyed.

VR Content

Envisioned the legacy of historical heritage conservation

Tangible assets :
location landscapes and natural ambience.

Intangible heritages :
knowledge inherited from past generations.

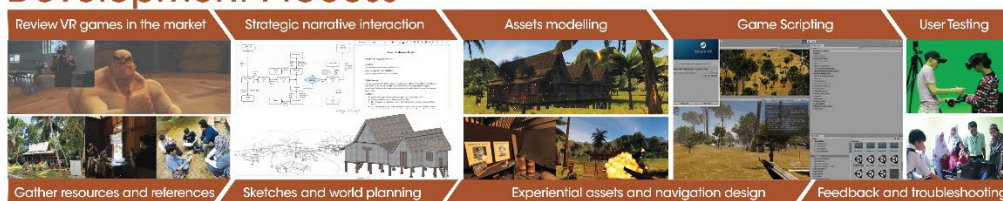

Cognitive experience :
imaginative visions, sensations and sounds of the war.

Interactive visual narrative:
"historically sympathetic setting" and "invoke that sense of connection through asset features."
eg: such as storytelling gameplay based on the real story and the forest hill features of South East Asia that are covered with low level shrubs and rainforest tree of Malaya.

Issues Highlight

- Critical task of remembering the war.
- National affair to remind the young of major war events.
- Local were not familiar with their 'own' history and national hero.
- The 'heritage' of war was eminently suitable to be pressed into the service of nation-building, reworked as a prelude to nationalism.
- The rising number of people now engaging in battlefield tourism and overseas pilgrimages to war and memorial sites.

Development Process

Commercialization

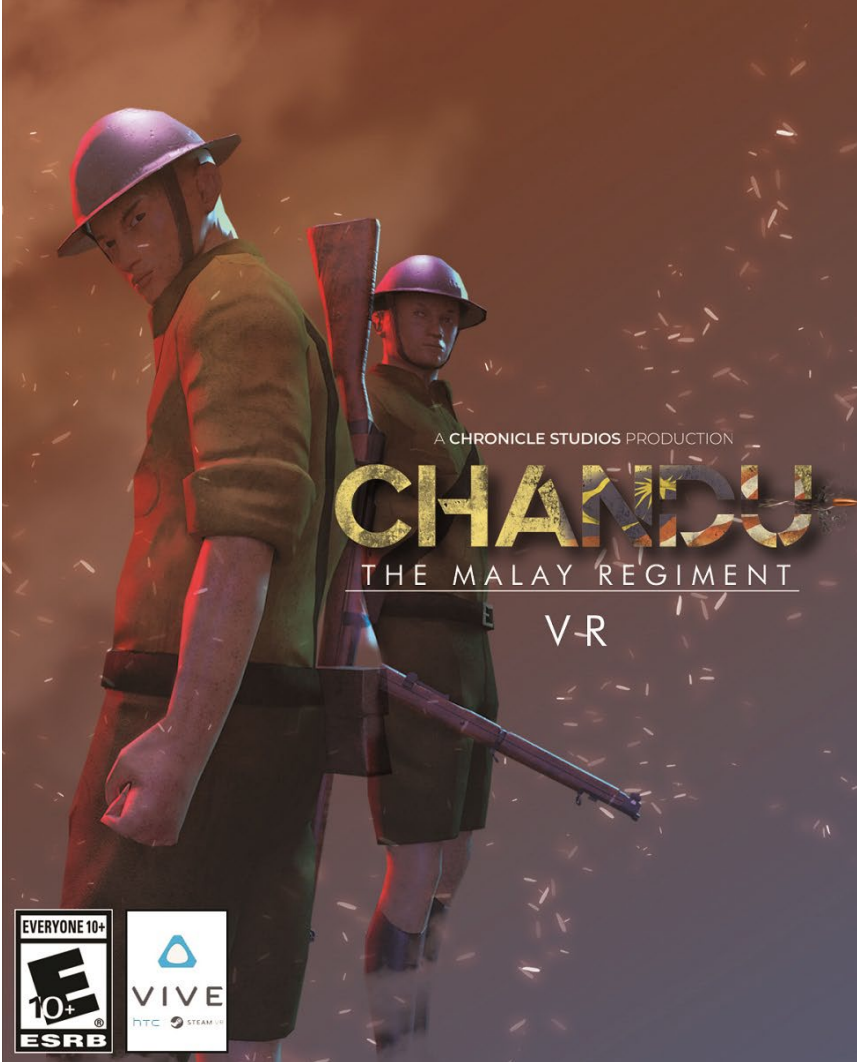

- Potential partners especially those in historical and cultural heritage programme.
